Tourism destinations such as restaurants can be a place for people to escape their daily routine in a supportive environment for relaxation and healing. With materials and designs that provide natural ambience, we can design buildings that allow the visitors to heal their mentality in healing spaces whilst visiting the location. When both tourism and nature are combined in architecture, it can result in an approach to a destination that is easily accessible and allow visitor to immerse in themselves in the travel experience. A tourism destination such as a restaurant can provide a narrative of culture in its food, as well as interior. It can be a place for visitors to enjoy their meal, rest and learn through cultural exploration. Using culture to draw the essence of the destination get away, Japanese culture has deep roots of culinary and tranquil designs that combines but built environment and landscaping. The Japanese designs in roofs, window frames, zen garden and tori gates share a distinct image and identity of the Japanese culture shared through its architecture and form. The results of this application of Japanese architecture can create a beautiful and inspirational destination for the public to enjoy.
